Phil 1:27,28 -

The inventory, which measured feedback from 2,000 U.S. adults back in January, shows significant differences in the beliefs of Millennials (ages 18 to 36) and Baby Boomers (ages 56-74) in almost every variable studied.

Although 61 percent of Millennials identify as Christians, their other responses don't mesh with that label. Compared to Boomers, Millennials are 28 percentage points less likely to say they follow the Golden Rule, twice as likely to say they respect only people who hold similar beliefs as them, less than half as likely to say life is sacred, and 28 percentage points more likely to cling to revenge.

In what Barna calls a "robust rejection of the Christian faith," research shows that Millennials are disengaging from traditional Christianity. They're less likely to believe in absolute moral truth, view the Bible as a reliable moral guide, be committed to practicing their faith, pray and worship during a typical week, confess their sins, believe that God created humans in his image, and believe that God loves them unconditionally.
